TRUSSEL ROAD

Dear Mr. Pickering,

My brother Bob McLaughlin and I visited Nolly and the McGilvray cemetery the day I called you. It certainly is a nice spot and Nolly keeps it well. It was interesting knowing where they homesteaded. He probably thought it unusual to have visitors on consecutive days.

I'm sending sheet I contrived on Daniel and Catherine. It differs from your's somewhat. I don't remember where I came up with Catherine's husband without checking further. I thought Jim Merritt came in later generation, maybe Angus daughter husband. They sure stuck to the same names. I saw a computer list from California which listed a Daniel in their family born in 1861 but I don't have anything on him.

I'm also sending you a copy of a very confused letter I got secondhand from a Mrs. McSwain in Texas. I've never written her. When I get new information, I go back and try to decipher it again, but think she is as fouled up as I am.

Also enclosed notes from more cemeteries where McGilvray's are buried. If you are interested in where all Griff's offspring are buried I can come up with locations. You left off my mother Alice in their children. I also have the next generation but in no condition to duplicate right now. Hugh Alexander is really Uncle Mac.

I have never found Catherine's mother and father. Notes from one McGilvray said was Hugh McDonald. There were McDonalds in Perry County on 1818 tax rolls, including a Hugh. There was Hugh in 1860 census born about 1799. There was a Hugh born in Perry County about 1831. The Catherine I'm looking for was gone from home by the time they started listing names on census. There was Hugh with wife Catherine and daughter Catherine who married Wedgeworth. I have that ones division of property by children Austin, Mary Jane, etc. Do you have information on who Catherine's parents were and further back? I need help too.

I talked to elderly Viola Lee along with Mrs. Moore one day. I believe she said her grandmother was a morris who married a McDonald and Tamer McDonald married Chesley Morris. They are all tied in with my Uncle Oscar Morris who married Ollie Draughn. Oscar and Ollie lived in Morristown for awhile.

There is a Martha Ellen McGilvray buried by Uncle Duncan and Aunt Christine. Do you know who she is? There was also Claire age 13 living with Alex and Daniel in 1870. Who is she?

Maybe we can get together soon and compare notes. When you go to copy other cemetery we could meet at Nolly's and all go together. Nolly told us he didn't know of any other old cemeteries.

We followed Salem Church road enroute to cemetery where Grantham's are buried and may have passed your home.

Sincerely,

Betty

Mrs. Ferguson is very busy with her children and grandchildren & out-of-town a lot. I had a hard time talking to her--she had put up her notes, etc. The above notes were taken during a telephone conversation, and I may have ommissions or errors.

Mrs. Ferguson has a Presbyterian book from Miss., very old, which she said I could look at in her home. I will do so & share with you. She also said that there were several old Scottish bibles in Miss., Gaelic bibles. Was that McSWAIN bible in Gaelic?

The other interesting thing that Mrs. Ferguson told me--that you probably already know--She said that the McLeod house on corner of Main St., across from library in Hattiesburg, still lived in by the family, has a historical marker on it. Mr. & Mrs. Ferguson went there 2 yrs. ago, knocked at the door, and introduced themselves. The descendant living there is a distant cousin, and kin to Mr. Ferguson. I wonder if they aren't also kin to → our MCSWAINs & MC Kenzies?? Do you know them? You might want to talk to them--it would be worth a try. Evidently they have quite a lot of information. This is almost as exciting as Christmas morning! New to *P & stumbled across your note of 5/6 (good thing I printed it out because for the life of me, can't find it now) re sub. Seems I have some "McGillvray's" in my ancestry. I noticed you spelled your differently. Have dates but no residences. Marriage of Jean Baptiste Marchand (Capt. in French army) to a "woman" of the "Windclan" Creek Indians>>> produced a daughter Sehoy Marchand who married a Lachlan McGillivray, from Scotland, in 1719. They had 3 children, Alexander, Sophia & Jeannet. Alexander did not marry, thus not carrying the McGillivray name any further on that side. Even tho name is spelled differently & have no earthly idea where they lived, could they be any of the tree you're searching for? Sure hope so.

CHAPTER XXI.

An Account of the McGillivray Family—The Revolutionary War.

War had now raged between the mother country and her colonies of North America for more than three years. It had become fierce and sanguinary along the Atlantic. But the people of West Florida, whose government was composed chiefly of military dependencies, had hitherto enjoyed peace. They were mostly loyal subjects of the King. But now, even in this remote region, the contest began to be felt. The Creek Indians were relied upon, mainly, by the British authorities, to harass the whig inhabitants of Georgia and Carolina. They had stationed at Hickory Ground, the site of the lower suburbs of the modern Wetumpka, Colonel Tait, an English officer, of captivating address, for the purpose of influencing the Creeks in behalf 1778 of the King. There, he soon became acquainted with the most gifted and remarkable man that ever was born upon the soil of Alabama, the history of whose family will now be given.

A Scotch boy, of sixteen years of age, who had read of the wonders to be seen in America, ran away from his wealthy and respectable parents, living in Dunmaglass, and entered a ship which was bound for South Carolina. He arrived, without accident, at the port of Charleston. Young Lachlan McGillivray there first set his foot upon American soil. He then had no property, except a shilling in his pocket, a suit of clothes upon his back, a red head, a stout frame, an honest heart, a fearless disposition, and cheerful spirits, which seldom became depressed.

About this period, the English were conducting an extensive commerce with the Cherokees, Chickasaws and 1735 those of the Creeks who were not in the interest of the French. Young McGillivray repaired to the extensive quarters of the traders, in the suburbs of Charleston. There he saw hundreds of pack horses, pack saddles, and curious looking pack horsemen, in demi-civilized garbs, together with packs of merchandise, ready to be carried to the wilderness. The keen eyes of one of these traders soon fell upon the smart Scotch boy, who, he saw at a glance, would be useful to him. The next day, Lachlan might have been seen, in the pine woods, several miles distant from Charleston, mounted upon a horse, and driving others before him, in company with a whole caravan of traders. Arriving upon the Chattahoochie, his master, as a reward for his activity and accommodating spirit, gave him a jack knife, which he sold to an Indian receiving in exchange a few deer skins. These he sold in Charleston, upon his return, and the proceeds of this adventure laid the foundations of a large fortune. In the course of a few years, he became one of the boldest and most enterprising traders in the whole country. Whether it was owing to a superior address, a fearless disposition, or, which is more probable, a leaning towards the French, for personal interests, he even extended his commerce, without interruption, to the very neighborhood of Fort Toulouse.

At the Hickory Ground, a few miles above that fort, he found a beautiful girl, by the name of Sehoy Marchand, whose father once commanded at Fort Toulouse, and was there killed, in 1722, by his own soldiers, as we have already seen. Her mother was a full-blooded Creek woman, of the tribe of the Wind, the most aristocratic and powerful family in the Creek nation. Sehoy was an Indian name, which had attached to many persons of the family, time out of mind.

Sehoy Marchand, when first seen by young Lachlan McGillivray, was a maiden of sixteen, cheerful in countenance, bewitching in looks, and graceful in form. Her unfortunate father, Captain Marchand, was a Frenchman, of dark complexion, and, consequently, this beautiful girl scarcely looked light enough for a half blood; but then, her slightly curled hair, her vivacity and peculiar gesticulation, unmistakably exposed her origin. It was not long before Lachlan and Sehoy joined their destinies in marriage, according to the ceremony of the country. The husband established a trading house at Little Tallase, four miles above Wetumpka, on the east bank of the Coosa, and there took home his beautiful wife. The Indian tradition ran, that, while pregnant with her first child, she repeatedly dreamed of piles of manuscripts, of ink and paper, and heaps of books, more than her eyes had ever beheld in the fort, when, a child, she used to visit her father. She was delivered of a boy, who received the name of Alexander, and who, when grown to manhood, wielded a pen which commanded the admiration and respect of Washington and his cabinet, and which influenced the policy of all Spanish Florida.

About 1745

Lachlan McGillivray, assisted by his alliance with the most influential family in the Creek nation, continued to extend his commerce. He became wealthy, and owned two plantations, well stocked with negroes, upon the Savannah, besides stores filled with Indian merchandise, in the towns of Savannah and Augusta. When his son, Alexander, was fourteen years of age, he carried him to Charleston, by the consent of his wife, for we have seen that, among the Creeks particularly, the children always belonged to the mother. He was placed at school in that town, and, after a few years, was transferred to a counting house at Savannah. But Alexander had a distaste for business, and, while the other clerks were delving among the goods, and squabbling with the pack-horse traders, he was accustomed to steal to some corner, and there pore over the histories of European nations. Having an inordinate thirst after knowledge, his father, through the advice of his friends, again carried him to Charleston, and placed him with a clergyman of his name, with whom, in a short time, he mastered the Greek and Latin tongues, and became a good belles lettres scholar. But Alexander was now a man. He had a thousand times thought, and dreamed, of his bow and arrows, his blow-gun, his mother's house by the side of the clear and beautiful Coosa, in which he used to fish and bathe with the Indian lads of his own age—of the old warriors, who had so often recounted to him the deeds of his ancestors—of the bright eyes of his two lovely sisters, Sophia and Jeannet—yes, he remembered all these, and, one day, he turned his back upon civilization, and his horse's head towards his native land.

About this time, the Chiefs of the Creek nation were getting into much trouble with the people of Georgia, and with anxiety they had awaited the time when Alexander McGillivray could, by his descent from the Wind family, assume the affairs of their government. His arrival now was most opportune, and the first we hear of him, after he had so suddenly left Charleston, he was presiding at a grand national council, at the town of Coweta, upon the Chattahoochie, where the adventurous Leclerc Milfort was introduced to him, as we have seen. He was, at this time, about thirty years of age. He was then in great power, for he had already become the object of attention on the part of the British authorities of the Floridas. When Colonel Tait was stationed upon the Coosa, they conferred upon Alexander McGillivray the rank and pay of a colonel, and associated him with Tait, for the purpose of procuring, through them, the alliance of the Creek nation in the war of the revolution. McGillivray, throughout the whole war, was devoted to their interests, and it was natural that he should have pursued that course towards those who first honored him; besides, his father, a man of great influence, was also a royalist.

Colonel McGillivray was tall, rather slender, and of a constitution by no means robust. To be a leader in war was not his forte, and was unsuited to his tastes and habits. His great power lay in diplomacy, and in the controlling of men, as the reader will often see, in perusing this history at a later date.

1778 In 1778, he carried on an extensive correspondence with the British colonial governments of Florida, and also with that of the province of Georgia, and was indefatigable in co-operating with Tait, in confederating the Indians against the whigs. During the war, he led, in person, several expeditions with that officer; but his chief reliance was upon Leclerc Milfort, a man at once bold, daring, enthusiastic, possessed of an iron constitution, and every way qualified to lead Indians into battle. He often did so, while Col. McGillivray remained at home, controlling the arbitrary Chiefs, and compelling them to raise warriors for his King. All the while, McGillivray was not unmindful of the aggrandizement of himself and his nation, for it must be borne in mind that the blood which coursed his veins was Scotch, French and Indian. During the desperate struggle for human liberty, he acted in concert with many royalists, who had fled to East Florida, among the most conspicuous of whom were Colonel Daniel McGirth, and his brother, Captain James McGirth. They were bad men, but were brave and enterprising, and well suited to the times. Colonel McGirth commanded the "Florida Rangers," whose sudden and sanguinary attacks the whigs of Georgia often severely felt. Leaving Colonel McGillivray, with his red army and white allies, engaged in expeditions most harassing to the Georgians, on their western frontier, we hasten to portray the exciting scenes about Natchez.*

1778 Mar. 7 Here, also, the revolution began to be felt. James Willing, of Philadelphia, with a small body of American soldiers, arrived at Natchez, by the way of the Ohio. The ports upon that river, and the Upper Mississippi, had fallen into the hands of the Americans, and had been supplied, for more than a year, by shipments from New Orleans, in consequence of a private arrangement between Don Galvez and Oliver Pollock, the American agent at New Orleans. Willing was now sent to further that end, and he was supplied with blank commissions, and authorized to recruit for the American service. Knowing that the inhabitants of this part of West Florida were loyal subjects of Britain, to allay their opposition to his schemes, he first sought to place them in a neutral position. A man of ingenuity and address, he made speeches, eloquently depicting the justice of our cause, and the certainty of final success, asserted that five thousand troops were then on their way to protect these inhabitants from the aggressions of the British government. He generally prevailed on them to take an oath of strict neutrality. Also enlisting a hundred men, whose officers he commissioned, he continued his voyage to Manchac, and was equally successful there. By stratagem, he made himself master of an English armed ship, which he conveyed to New Orleans, sold to the Spaniards, and wasted the avails in debauchery. With two subalterns, and forty of his original party, he returned to Manchac, plundered the plantations, without distinction, and rioted upon the booty. In the meantime, the Natchez people, hearing of these outrages, formed a large armed association, for their protection, and stationed themselves about the mouth of St. Catherine, not far below Natchez, to prevent the ascent of Captain Willing. He was presently seen to approach, but turned his boats to the opposite side of the Mississippi. Through the effects of a flag, and upon his professions of friendship, and assurances that he intended no injury to this section of the country, he received permission from the "settlers" to come over to them, across the river. After some consultation, he despatched Lieuten- 1778 ant Harrison, with a command, in a boat. In the meantime, the "associated settlers," reposing confidence in the prom-

THE MacGILLIVRAY FAMILY

Of very ancient Celtic origin, the MacGillivrays are considered to be of the same stock as certain Argyllshire clans which had close affinity in early times with the race of Somerled, Thane of Argyll and Lord of the Isles. In 1153 the famous Somerled, ancestor of the McDonald Clan, reigned unchallenged in the Argyll peninsula of Kintyre and nearby islands, having driven out the Scandinavians who, for four centuries, had invaded and pillaged Scotland's northern and western islands. Somerled was one of six earls who opposed the rising monarchical system in favor of the old Celtic method of tanist succession, and was defeated and killed in 1164 by the men of Walter, 1st High Steward of Scotland, at the head of the army of Malcolm IV. Note: Tanistry was a system among various Celtic tribes of choosing by election the oldest or worthiest of the chief's kin, to succeed him.

Gillivray, or Gillibride, father of Somerled, is generally accepted as the progenitor of the MacGillivrays, who lived originally far to the north in Caithness and Sutherland, according to old chroniclers. About the beginning of the eleventh century, they and kindred clans spread south and west into the Western Islands and the districts of Morvern in Argyll and Lochaber in south-western Inverness-shire between Loch Linnhe and the Grampian Mountains. The MacGillivrays, a principal clan in Somerled's time, were involved in the ruin which overtook all his adherents in 1222, when Alexander II conquered Argyll, the Western Highlands, and the Isles. The Morvern branch came under the protection of the MacLeans of Mull, while the main Lochaber branch took protection under Farquhar Mackintosh 5th in northeast Inverness-shire. In 1160 the Mackintosh chieftain had been awarded lands near Inverness together with the constableship of that castle, for helping Malcolm IV to quell a rebel rising in neighboring Moray. The Lochaber MacGillivrays established themselves at Dunmaglass in Strath Nairn, a few miles to the west of their Mackintosh protector.

In 1291 Angus Mackintosh 6th married Eva,daughter and heir of the 6th chieftain of Clan Chattan, thus becoming Captain of the ancient Clan Chattan Confederation. Duncan MacGillivray, chief of his family, married Isabella, daughter of Eneas Mackintosh, son of Farquhar 5th, bringing the MacGillivrays into the Chattan group, in which they attained a high place, and added considerably to clan lands along the Nairn. The Davidson Clan chief married a daughter of Angus Mackintosh 6th, and before 1350 sought the protection of William Mackintosh 7th, within the Chattan Confederation. Finally, the Woods family is found in Nairnshire near Inverness by the thirteenth century. Thus conquests, clan feuds, and intermarriages first brought together near Inverness the Highland MacGillivrays, Woods, Davidsons, and Clarks (sept of the Mackintosh Clan), whose American descendants, four and five centuries later, married into the Kilpatricks of Ulster and South Carolina.

Within the MacGillivrays and the Chattan Confederation, as with other Highlanders, families and clans were divided among themselves over political and religious repression during the reign of the Stuart king, Charles II. Farquhar of Dunmaglass deserted Mackintosh and other lieges of the "Highland Host" ordered by the Government to suppress a Presbyterian insurrection in the west of Scotland. Two uncles of Dunmaglass, Bean and Lachlan MacGillivray, did march with Mackintosh. In June 11, 1679, the Presbyterian Covenanters defeated the Royalists at Drumclog in Lanarkshire, but three weeks later their small army was crushed at Bothwell Bridge by the king's natural son, James, Duke of Monmouth. When the openly Catholic Stuart king, James II of England, succeeded his brother Charles II in 1685, the Privy Council was still checking several hundred persons thought to have been at Bothwell Bridge and as many others were imprisoned for their refusal to acknowledge James II. The sporadic emigration of Highlanders became, after 1680, systematic, accounting for early immigration to Ulster or to the New World from the very small MacGillivray Clan of Dunmaglass.

The above-mentioned Farquhar MacGillivray was the father of Alexander (#1) Kilpatrick's wife, as shown earlier, and her mother was Emilia Stewart of Newtoune. Stewart is a surname emotionally charged among the Scots, Stewarts -- later Stuarts -- having held the throne of Scotland through three hundred turbulent years, and an even more troubled century in England. The name derives from the office of steward of the royal household, whose duties included commanding the army.

The first of the name in Scotland was Walter, son of a Norman baron and companion to William the Conqueror, who was appointed first High Steward of the Royal Household of Scotland by David I (1124-1154). This is now a very common name throughout the English-speaking world, and Anderson states in The Scottish Nation (see references): "Some of the principal branches having diverged from the main line at a period antecedent to its becoming royal (with Robert II in 1371), it may be assumed that those who retain the original Stewart spelling belong to one or other of those prior branches."

Cursory study indicates that Emilia Stewart of Newtoune belonged to one of the more obscure of those early branches, and research in Scotland will be necessary to identify her family. Of sixteen Newtons and seven Newtowns listed in Smith's Genealogical Gazeteer of Scotland, Emilia's home was undoubtedly the village of Newton, population 118, located in the midst of MacGillivray - Davidson - Mackintosh - Clark country, in the parish of Urquhart and Logie Wester. A large Scottish Free Church parish, Urquhart and Logie Wester falls partly in Nairnshire and partly in Ross-Cromarty, both of which share borders with Inverness-shire. The tiny village of Newton is in the Nairnshire portion of the parish, near Dunlichty parish (now combined with Daviot) where MacGillivray chiefs are buried. Almost certainly the Castle Stewart mentioned near Petty parish in Daniel Clark's 1757 will (op.cit.) was Emilia Stewart MacGillivray's place of birth, Petty parish being located six miles northeast of Inverness, partly in Nairnshire and partly in Inverness-shire.

Stewart, Stuart, and Steuart holdings which dot the clan map throughout Scotland include only major land holders, which the Stewarts of Newtoune were not. They may be an off-shoot of the Stuarts of Darnaway Castle on the river Findhorn in Nairnshire, approximately 15 miles east of Newton. David Stewart, progenitor of the Stewarts of Atholl on the southeastern border of Inverness-shire, had a grandson known as "Big John" Stewart, who served as Lieutenant Colonel of Nairn's Regiment in the Rising of 1715 for the Stewarts, and therefore merits close scrutiny in relation to the Stewarts of Newton in Nairnshire.

In 1714, the MacGillivray chieftainship descended to another Farquhar, son of Farquhar and Emilia Stewart MacGillivray. This Farquhar married in 1716 Elizabeth Mackintosh, daughter of William of Aberarder, a neighbor a mile or two along the Nairn from Dunmaglass. It is not surprising that the MacGillivrays were Stuart adherents and took a prominent part in the Jacobite Risings of 1715 and 1745. The Laird served as Captain in the Clan Chattan Regiment in 1715, and his brother William as Lieutenant. Alexander, Chief of the MacGillivrays in 1745, died at Culloden while commanding the Clan Chattan Regiment that almost wiped out the Hanoverians' left wing.

The marriage of Farquhar MacGillivray's sister to Alexander Kilpatrick almost certainly took place in Ulster, where their children were born. Kilpatricks have never been endemic in the Inverness area, and Dr. Jean Dunlop Monro of Edinburgh, professional historian and MacGillivray researcher, reports that no Kilpatrick - MacGillivray marriage is on record there. On the other hand, Kilpatricks had been living in Lifford, on the border between the Ulster counties of Donegal and Tyrone, as early as 1620. By coincidence, a Newtown Stewart is situated less than ten miles below Lifford, Stewarts being among the original Plantation of Ulster settlers. Dr.Monro's research confirms that a number of descendants of the Lairds of Dunmaglass emigrated to South Carolina and Georgia. They arrived in Charleston concurrently with Alexander Kilpatrick in the 1720's and 1730's, by way of North Ireland in at least one other case: the will of John McGilvery (sic) proved June 12,1736 in Charleston, contained a quaint codicil, bequeathing "all of my residual estate to my wife Elizabeth (Hazard) if she does not marry an Irishman but only one third if she does".

It is generally recognized that individuals bearing an uncommon name, such as MacGillivray, are close kin when found together at an early date, and recurring Christian names and matching life-styles are added proof that the MacGillivrays of South Carolina and Georgia were of the Dunmaglass branch. Alexander Kilpatrick's MacGillivray in-laws almost certainly led him to Indian trading, in which several of them were influential; one became famous. John MacGillivray of Charleston was licensed on January 18,1730 to head a Creek trading company. From the 1730's, Archibald MacGillivray was head of a western (Creek-Choctaw) trading company while based at New Windsor twp., S.C., across from Augusta, Ga. In 1741 Patrick Brown, a former Catawba trading partner of Alexander Kilpatrick, joined Archibald MacGillivray's firm and became, according to Meriwether, "by far the most important of the principal traders".

The will of Patrick Brown of Augusta, Ga., Alexander Kilpatrick's former partner, proved Aug.15, 1755 in Charleston, named as executors his partners Daniel Clarke and Laughlan MacGillivray of Augusta, their firm being known as Clark and MacGillivray, and Daniel Clarke's close association with the MacGillivray family has already been mentioned.

Lachlan (Laughlan) became the most influential of the MacGillivray traders, and the biographer of his famous son Alexander has thoroughly documented his Dunmaglass origin (John W.Caughey: MacGillivray of the Creeks, 1938). Lachlan arrived in Charleston as a youth, and set up his trading post on the Coosa River in the heart of the Creek Nation in Georgia (present Elmore County, Alabama), and married the half-French, half-Creek Sehoy Marchand, mother of his son Alexander and his daughters Jennet and Sophia. Lachlan rendered signal service to Britain by keeping the Creeks from joining the French, during the French and Indian War. He remained an ardent Royalist, and had his considerable estate confiscated at the outbreak of the Revolution, as did his kinsman William MacGillivray of Georgia, who returned to Britain in 1779. Lachlan's wife was dead and his children grown when he returned alone to Dunmaglass, there to receive word in 1793 that his son was dead aged thirty-four.

Alexander MacGillivray, son of Lachlan, of one-fourth Creek blood, was "Alabama's most remarkable native son, and an Indian statesman unsurpassed", according to Caughey (op.cit.). He was educated as a Creek by his mother and as a Scot by his father's cousin and tutor, the Calvinist minister Rev.Farquhar MacGillivray of Charleston. Alexander was respected equally by the Creeks, the British, the Spanish and Seminoles of Florida, and even by the American rebels who had proscribed and banished his father. They all named him to high posts during his brief career, and it was George Washington who in 1790 commissioned the former ardent British Royalist as U.S. agent with the rank of Brigadier General. Alexander died while carrying out the duties of that office, on February 17, 1793 in Pensacola.

Knowledge of the MacGillivray-Kilpatrick connection, with which this chapter begins, is due solely to the fact that a fourth-generation descendant, Judith Clark (Kilpatrick) Davidson (#16) was born, reared, and died near her cousins of the Lachlan MacGillivray branch, whom she knew personally. Lachlan and Sehoy (Marchand) MacGillivray's daughter Jennet married the Frenchman LeClerc de Milfort, and her sister Sophia married the French Huguenot, Benjamin Durant of South Carolina. Both de Milfort and Durant, brothers-in-law of Gen. Alexander MacGillivray, established their plantations on the lower Alabama River, near its confluence with the Tombigbee, within a few miles of Woods Bluff on the Tombigbee, where Judith Davidson lived throughout her life. Her son, John C. Davidson, stated: "Wetherford, an Englishman, married Alexander MacGillivray's daughter ... a second cousin of my mother, Judith Kilpatrick" (op.cit.). Davidson identified both his remote MacGillivray-Kilpatrick ancestress, and Lachlan MacGillivray, as children of MacGillivray chiefs.More precise MacGillivray data now in hand indicates that Lachlan, born ca 1719, was the son of Farquhar MacGillivray who married Elizabeth Mackintosh in 1716, making him a nephew of Alexander Kilpatrick's MacGillivray wife. Thus Judith Clark(Kilpatrick) Davidson and the children of General Alexander MacGillivray had as their common progenitor Farquhar MacGillivray, who married Emilia Stewart in 1681 in Dunmaglass.

THE McGREW FAMILY

The name McGrew is the short form of McGrewer/McGrewar, one of numerous surnames adopted by members of the famous and turbulent McGregor Clan when, in 1603, James I ordered the clan disbanded and the name McGregor outlawed because of bloody feuds with rival clans. In 1660, Charles II repealed the proscription in gratitude for their support, but the acts were renewed upon the accession of William of Orange in 1689. It was not until 1775 that the penal statutes against the MacGregors were finally repealed, and many branches retained their adopted names, including the McGrews who were by then well represented in America.

According to the family researcher, Robert Earl McGrew (1871-1949) of Giles County, Tennessee, the McGrews originally came from the Scottish Highlands near Anstruther, southeast of Cupar in County Fife, on the Firth of Forth. Under the ban of 1603, many fled to northern Ireland, and researchers generally agree that Omagh City in County Tyrone was the Ulster home of most branches of American McGrews, although some came directly from Scotland. In the classic pattern of Scots-Irish migration, some McGrews disembarked at the Delaware River ports, others at the port of Charleston, with members of the Pennsylvania branch converging with "cousins" from the South in the Carolina Piedmont, before the Revolution. Only the latter are of direct interest within the context of this chapter.

McGrews arrived in Charleston concurrently with Alexander Kilpatrick (#1) as evidenced by the St.Phillip's Parish Register and Journals of the Commons House of Assembly. Edward and Solomon McGrew (Magrew,McGraw)
